What if fundraising stopped?

Because of funding constraints, the National Cancer Institute can now only award 1 out of every 8 research applications. This is especially devastating since experts believe we are on the verge of making great strides in cancer treatment. Without a pipeline of investigators to continue this lifesaving work, progress will come to a halt. This is why fundraising can't stop and so important that Komen helps fill a gap by funding research. In addition, Komen public policy advocates tirelessly call on state and federal lawmakers to increase research funding to help alleviate the burden on patients.

Komen funds at work

Komen has invested nearly $1.1 billion in breast cancer research, with more than $720 million of that since the start of the Susan G. Komen 3-Day®.

Komen is currently funding 144 active research grants for $105 million in 24 states, DC and 3 countries/territories.

Nearly 100 Komen-supported research labs are actively studying critical areas of MBC research like mechanisms of MBC, novel treatments, drug resistance, and recurrence.

“We know a lot about breast cancer, but a lot is to be learned. Susan G. Komen is providing us with funding to pursue research that is saving lives.”
